From the Old Homeland to the New Homeland | 1938 | Federico Freudenheim
Coloured pen and pencil on paper: 21 x 23.5 cm / 8.2 x 9.2 in. Private collection

The child's map in a school exercise book shows one family's odyssey from Europe to South America in the late 1930s, but could represent the journey of all those refugees – the Freudenheims were German Jews fleeing the Holocaust – who must embark on their journey without knowing their destination. Federico (then Fritz) was still in Germany when he drew the first stages of the journey, in which they travelled from the family home in Muhlhausen to Berlin, probably to obtain the correct papers to allow them to leave the country. From Hamburg they took a ship down the Atlantic coast of Europe to Mexico, then across the Atlantic to Brazil and ultimately Uruguay. Freudenheim's childish map dignifies the horror that presumably motivated his parents' decision to emigrate, although in hindsight the carefully drawn train and chilling reminders of those that carried other German Jews to the death camps. The map is also striking testimony to children's early absorption of the conventions of cartography. From the strip map across the top of the page, Freudenheim works out how to fit in Belgium, France and Spain in the usual orientation, with north at the top, even at the cost of accurate scales. The bright colours in which he depicts South America seem to echo the school-boy's optimism about the future.

Lyari, Karachi | 2014 | Madha Sikander & Pupils of B.F. Cabral Government Boys' Primary School, Karachi
Mixed media on paper: 61 x 91 cm / 24 x 36 in. Private collection

Even the most playful maps can have a serious purpose. In Karachi – Pakistan's largest city and one of the fastest-growing cities in the world – neighbourhoods such as Lyari have developed in quality that they have lost most of their public spaces. One of the groups on which this has most impact is children, who must find their own playgrounds wherever they can: in streets, in markets, on roofs. This children's map charts these hidden places, using bright colours to highlight the playgrounds – mel and improvised – where their adventures take place. Broken as Tabali (Change Through Children) is a group of artists who use maps to help children visualize the city, in the belief that this will help adults become more aware of Karachi's current needs and of the potential of its young people. For this map, the artist Madha Sikander collaborated with fifth-grade pupils from a local primary school. The children's embossed map shows their perception of the places and people around them and embodies a pragmatic approach to the present as well as hope for the future.
